A time you had to organize a plan for yourself or a team to reach a complex goal:

Situation.

When I first started working at Pinkerton Security as a manager, I was made aware of the service quality issues that the company was facing. After examining the company's operation, I determined that service quality issues were related to image and retention.

Task.

My priority was to address the service quality as quickly as possible, which meant resolving the company's image and retention issues.

Action.

I began visiting the clients individually to introduce myself and inquire about their concerns about the service.

I arranged meetings with the security teams to discuss clients' concerns and their perspectives on possible solutions.

I analyzed the schedules and made necessary changes to make them more efficient and beneficial for the security teams.

I requested an appropriate budget for new uniforms to enhance the company's image.

I requested a budget for radio and communication services for each account.

Reviewed post orders for each account and made changes that reflected solutions to the client's concerns.

Result.

Overall service quality, along with employee retention and company image, increased considerably.
